

9th March 2010

German – Near and Middle East Aviation Conference

in the framework of  ILA Berlin Air Show on 9th June 2010 in Berlin

The aviation industry looks forward to continuing growth in the Middle East. The region does not only offer some of the world's finest airlines but all signs are pointing towards expansion as well. Already today, the Middle East countries account for 50% of all aircraft orders worldwide. The UAE alone is expected to spend USD 114.2 billion on new aircrafts in the next twenty years. At the same time, numerous new airports are being built or are expanded. While Egypt plans to build three new airports in the country, the enlargement of Kuwait International Airport and the extension of Saudi Arabia's King Abdulaziz International Airport to fit four more terminals and upgrade the runways are planned. Saudi Arabia will also expand several other airports, among them Tabuk and Medina. Recognising that Dubai International Airport today is the world's sixth-largest aviation hub, the Middle East offers good business opportunities to aviation companies and aviation infrastructure providers.
